

GEORGETOWN PUBLIC POLICY REVIEW

CALL FOR PAPERS

Deadline: November 10, 2009

The Georgetown Public Policy Review is the student-run, peer-reviewed, academic journal of the Georgetown Public Policy Institute. Each issue explores a theme in public policy and management through well-researched articles, interviews, book reviews, and essays. The Review is currently seeking submissions of academic articles for the 2010 edition based on the following theme:

GLOBAL HEALTH: DISEASE CONTROL, DEVELOPMENT, AND PUBLIC HEALTH POLICY

Submissions may focus on a wide variety of national or international affairs, though they should avoid the current debate over health care insurance in the United States. Possible topics include but are not limited to:

- Government and non-government responses to disease, both international and national;
- Challenges associated with specific infections such as H1N1 Flu, HIV/AIDS, and malaria;
- Development as it relates to public health (e.g. water quality); or
- Relationships between a country's health and its political and economic stability.

The Review welcomes submissions of unsolicited manuscripts including articles, book reviews, and commentaries on a rolling basis up to November 10, 2009. Guidelines for submissions to the Review are as follows:

- All articles must be original pieces.
- All submissions must include a 150-250 word abstract and a one to three line author bio.
- Research articles should be 3,000-5,000 words; 3,000 words is the preferred length.
- Commentaries, opinion articles, and book reviews should be between 850 and 2,000 words.
- Please send a disk copy with three hard copies or an electronic file attachment through email.
- Citations should follow the author-date system outlined in the Chicago Manual of Style.
- All formatting and grammar should follow the Chicago Manual of Style.
